TITLE: Discipleship Rhythms For a Community on Mission

It takes very few organized activities as a family to lead to healthy organic rhythms that naturally occur. And those organics then, because you're doing life-on-life together, oftentimes lead back to sort of micro-organized things. It's all very natural and easy.

Here are three things to consider about the rhythms of your community on mission...

1. Our ministry rhythms need to be both organized and organic. When we think about our family life together, we don't count up the number of events per week that we attend with each other and take attendance... We live with them! There is a fabric to our life together that cannot be reduced to a series of "events." The church is a family and a healthy family has both organized and organic rhythms to it.
2. Ministry and discipleship cannot merely be a series of events on the calendar. If all we have are organized events, all we offer people is a program. No one is looking for a program to sign up for. But, if all we do in our disciple-making is organic and rarely organized or predictable, it is hard for people to know what it is you are asking them to commit to, or how it will begin to affect their lives. Help folks understand the true nature of God's family and a life of walking in the ways of Jesus with you.
3. Structuring your Missional Community like a family, with organized and organic rhythms, takes into account the needs of everyone. A few organized family rhythms will perpetuate and facilitate numerous organic opportunities to BE a family and do a lot of normal life stuff together. Don't over-complicate things! Keep asking yourself, "What would a healthy family that has God as their Dad and Jesus as their brother be doing?" Pretty cool, huh?
