

EPISODE: 473

TITLE: Cigars, Theology & Discipleship

To disciple someone in all aspects of life requires a deliberate level of intentionality. It is essential to engage in everyday activities together and integrate discipleship and training into these ordinary moments.

Here are three key things to believe and consider about your discipleship methods...

1. Discipleship and leadership development should be normal and reproducible. Classes are great, but if you want people to know how to talk about, live out, and apply the gospel in everyday life, try and do more of your discipleship and training in natural settings that are familiar and reproducible.
2. The Good News is just as good (and sometimes better) experienced with a cold beverage and friends. Don't think that God somehow looks down on your efforts of discipleship if they are not done in a church building. Your old school board members may, but God does not. Jesus went into all the places and participated in the customs that the people he loved frequented. You can too... it's okay.
3. Give it a try! Host a Cigars & Theology group of your own. Or try something else that makes sense in your context, but get started with less conventional, more "normal" settings for training and equipping in the gospel. And by the way, events like this with a little tweak of language and posture can be great evangelistic opportunities as well.

While teaching and training in classrooms is fine, it will never fully develop a mature disciple all by itself. Just in the same way that we raise children in homes, at the park, at stores, in friends' homes, etc., so must our discipleship be life-on-life.
