TITLE: Neighborhood vs. Network Missional Communities

When making disciples in community, a common strategy question arises: Should we have a Missional Community that is only neighborhood-based, or should we start a Missional Community that's relationally network-based?

Here are three key things to believe and consider about organizing a Missional Community...

1. Starting a missional community takes a lot of intentionality and great trust in the Holy Spirit's leading. Whether you're building a community on mission with a group of other Christians, or starting alone with mostly not-yet-believers, you'll need to be super intentional in developing both organized and organic rhythms. Your goal is to increasingly live like a family and be able to experience the gospel transforming every area of life together.
2. God is committed to his eternal purpose to fill the world with his glory. And that includes your neighborhood and neighborhoods all across your city. Will you take the next step in joining him on this mission? Or will you continue to be a "church attender" with a little "mission" thrown into the margins of your life? You were created for just such a time as this and God has you exactly where he wants you. Trust him and get started!
3. Which are you doing? If you are starting a missional community (or have one), identify whether you're structured based on a network of relationships, or making disciples in closer proximity within your neighborhood. Healthy things always grow, and whichever way you start may change and morph, but determine where you're starting so you can plot a course.
