TITLE: Living On Mission With No Church Support

You want to live a more missional life—sharing everyday rhythms with others, building community, and making disciples. But what do you do when your pastor or church leadership isn't on board?

Here are three things to believe and consider about living on mission even without church support:

- 1. Making disciples as a lifestyle with families (nuclear and extended) on mission is the primary organizing structure of the church. God has always desired a worldwide, earthly family that would live in such a way as to show the world His love and generosity... inviting everyone to a place at His table. This needs to happen in all of the normal rhythms of everyday life... not just once each week.
- 2. The gospel is just as needed and powerful for Christians within the church as it is for not-yet believers outside of traditional church structures. Any and every environment or ministry style that proclaims and demonstrates the good news of the gospel is vital and should be honored. You will never lead a movement of change by being against anything. What are you for? Live as an example. Let your good deeds and humility shine the light for all to see.
- 3. Many of our ministry choices and strategies boil down to personal preference. But, disciple-making is the only mission that the church exists for, and discipleship happens in community: life on life, together on mission. If our churches are focused on funding and striving to get consumer Christians to sign up for endless programs, and they are not actively living as the present family of God ALL WEEK together as disciples who make disciples, they are missing out on the exact and only reason the Church exists. I implore you to please get started doing this right away and be the model for change that is needed.
