TITLE: Missional Community: Have You Really Tried It?

There's a huge difference between talking a good missional game and really living in a community that is radically focused on discipleship as a lifestyle.

Here are three key things to believe and consider about law and grace and true missional living:

- 1. Experiencing the Good News of the gospel in all of life is what discipleship is all about, regardless of what you call it. “Missional” is not a dirty word or dead or something to fear; but new law and religion is.
- 2. Religion teaches that your identity and self-worth are based mainly on how hard you work. But the Gospel truth is that your identity and self worth are centered on the one, Jesus, who already did everything that is required for us to live as the dearly loved, redeemed sons and daughters of God. Helping others see, believe and experience that too is a very high privilege, and one that will never go away in this life.
- 1. Get started growing in a deeper knowledge and experience of the gospel in everyday life. Be careful of how much “missional” activity you try and do, or prescribe to others, until you've helped your people grow in their gospel identity. This is where new motivations and rhythms start to naturally flow. And if your current version of missional community life is not feeling like a gift from God and something that is vibrant and growing, get the help you need to change that, today. This is too important to just nod our heads in agreement and keep doing the same religious activities—a life of great adventure and freedom that glorifies God awaits!
